Above: Cervantes is a city in Chihuahua, Mexico's largest state. This soundscape extends throughout Chihuahua, which borders the U.S. states of Texas and New Mexico and has a desert climate.

When you are asked to describe where you live, what do you say? Do you describe homes, shops, and businesses? Do you describe the people who live or work there? Maybe you describe landscape. All of these things help to define your sense of place, or what makes a certain place have its own distinctive character. One distinctive characteristic that helps to create a sense of place is sound. Every place has sounds that you might not notice, but those sounds help create a sense of place.

The students whose voices you’ll hear in these audio recordings collected sounds that defined their zip code's sense of place. Because sounds within a particular zip code change as its community does, these recordings serve as an acoustic archive of that place. These audio time capsules have also been preserved in the Library of Congress for future generations to experience.
For each zip code in NatGeo Education’s sense of place collection, you'll find three types of sounds:

- Most Distinctive: This is the sound that best represents a place. For example, at the beach this might be the sound of waves crashing.
- Humans and Environment Interacting: These sounds demonstrate how people who live in that place interact with it. In the beach example, this might be the sound of kids shouting as the waves lap at their feet, or the sound of a motorboat zipping through the water.
- Symbolic of Change: These sounds give clues about how a place is changing. In the beach example, the sound of heavy construction behind the dunes might indicate the development of new hotels or shopping centers.

Fast Facts

- Besides Spanish, many residents of Chihuahua speak Tarahumara, an indigenous language.
- Chihuahuas, the smallest breed of dog, are sometimes called "New Yorkers" in the state of Chihuahua.
- Ciudad Juarez is the largest city in Chihuahua, almost twice as large as the next-biggest urban area, the capital, Chihuahua City.
